Purpose: This strategy addresses students' prior knowledge about a unit or a topic. In this case, Romeo and Juliet. When students identify their gaps, they will want to fill them by reading the text.

Directions: Read this strategy before beginning any reading of Romeo and Juliet. It is a pre-reading activity for students. It may successfully be pre-reading or followed by an anticipation guide/discussion regarding the play's themes.

Directions:

(1) Read the following sheet in a large enough size that the students can easily see it. The writing added to the sheet should also be easily readable by the students from their seats.

(2) Tell the students that in preparation for reading Romeo and Juliet, it will be helpful to recall what we know about a lot of the subject. Recalling what we already know will help us decide what we want to learn. Once we determine what we want to learn, we can then better decide how to go about learning it. And when we learn, we will also recall what we know.

(3) Let the students know that for the next few minutes, you will be asking them questions to help all the class members recall what they already know about Romeo and Juliet.

The following questions could be used for writing on the column "What I know."

What do you know about Romeo and Juliet? (Students may answer "I was confused by Shakespeare" or "Romeo and Juliet had love letters.")
What else do you know about the play? (i.e. "The title, what fight took place between families?")

Continue writing students' knowledge by asking each question in "What else do you know?" "Do you know anything about _____?"

(4) Once the "What I know" column has several items listed, probably at least 10-15, ask the students to sit still to examine each entry that they know about Romeo and Juliet and to be ready to answer: "What I want to learn?"

Possible questions could include:

What do you want to learn about Romeo and Juliet? (Students may answer "I want to know who they killed themselves.")
What else do you want to learn?
